Types cut by Richard Austin around 1810 for two foundries in Glasgow were imported to the US by the Dickinson foundry and became known as Scotch Roman. These sturdy types, revived by Matthew Carter as Miller, are exceptionally well suited to news use. The Guardian of London commissioned an adaptation for their text use, now expanded into a graded series with bold and italics for emphasis and a lighter bold for running text; FB 1997-2002

News publishing methods may reproduce type faithfully, may add some amount of weight, or may reduce it by a fraction. Seventy years ago, C.H. Griffith prepared graded weights of Linotype Excelsior, encouraging publishers to choose the weight best matching image to inking. Font Bureau offers grades 1, 2, 3, and 4. You choose the grade yielding the best final image through your current platemaking and printing practices.
